Enigma, mystery, charm of the past, push the visitor to Santarcangelo towards the "strange" structures which riddle the Mons Jovis, the tufaceous hill upon which the present centre of Santarcangelo originated the XII century. Dug into the eastern side of Monte Giove, more than one hundred caves form a real underground town. The geologic nature of the mount adapts to the opening of the underground passages well. The hypogeums are, in fact, dug out of the tufa, which guarantees compactness and stability even if it is easy to perforate, and, in a minimum part clay. Notwithstanding this, over the centuries they have been tampered with; originally, they probably formed one big complex of caverns that were really connected: in fact, an air well exists, and its size leads to believe that there was notable development of the network. Regards their dating and destination of use, there are many different hypothesis. Some of these, even if not historically confirmed, are certainly fascinating.

This locality was first under Roman rule and then, after a dark age that lasted many centuries, that of the Malatesta, followed by that of the Montefeltro, of the Borgia, the Venetians, the Medici and finally the Pontifical State up to 1860, year in which Verucchio was annexed to the nascent Kingdom of Italy.
